Accreditation

Accreditation is a formal assessment conducted by an agency, supposedly independent of government and corporate forces, that has as its focus to determine if a particular educational program meets certain and specific expectations that all similar programs should meet. The University of the Republic is a new educational provider and as yet has not pursued or been awarded accreditation status. According to accreditation resources there shall be a period of two years of proven operations prior to initiating the accreditation process.

The University of the Republic will seek accreditation status. Once accreditation status in any educational program is achieved, all students who have completed coursework prior to accreditation status will fall under the new status. The University of the Republic makes the following promise: every attempt to gain accreditation status will be afforded.

The University of the Republic's primary mission is to provide quality education to anyone who desires it, and a quality program at a reasonable cost. However, the University of the Republic understands how much emphasis is placed on accreditation by students and future employers.

Therefore, the University of the Republic will do everything possible to ensure that the offered educational program and courses meet accreditation standards in the most expeditious manner, and will seek recognition by accreditation agencies for the entire program.
